Ann Parker / Los Ambulantes:
The Itinerant Photographers of Guatemala
Vintage Photographs from the 1970s

March 4 – April 30, 2016

Deborah Bell Photographs is delighted to announce its upcoming exhibition, Ann Parker / Los Ambulantes: The Itinerant Photographers of Guatemala / Vintage Photographs. The exhibition will be on view from March 4 through April 30, 2016.

This is the first exhibition of Ann Parker's important series, Los Ambulantes, in a New York gallery since 1981.

In the 1970s Parker made several trips to Guatemala with her husband, the writer Avon Neal, where she pursued the decade-long project that came to be known as Los Ambulantes.

Parker's photographs not only feature the sitters being photographed, but also the itinerant photographers themselves who made portraits and processed the final prints on the spot. In the preface to her book, Los Ambulantes: The Itinerant Photographers of Guatemala (Cambridge: MIT Press, 1982), Parker describes her experience chronicling a practice that was quickly disappearing and is now rarely found:

From that day in the spring of 1971 when I first chanced upon a group of itinerant photographers working with their old-fashioned cameras and painted backdrops in a Guatemalan marketplace I have been fascinated by their world and the images that pass before their lenses.

I am especially intrigued by the intensity with which Indians from highland villages react to being photographed [...]. Their almost trancelike expressions, so reminiscent of the formal portraiture found on tintypes and daguerreotypes, clearly show that for them the camera still retains much of the powerful magic it had in its earliest years. In our society, where it is not uncommon for people to be photographed hundreds of times, the psychological impact of facing a camera is greatly diminished. Many of the people [...] were typically appearing before a camera for the first and perhaps only time. The casual snapshot plays no part in their existence, and the rarity of coming before lens is reflected in the portraits.

In a kind of partnership with the itinerants, I have acted as their photographic spokesman to record, in a more lasting way than they are able to, the essence of their world. I brought to the task my vision, my photographic knowledge and equipment, and my firm belief in the importance of recording this folk tradition.
